NILES WOMAN IS FATALLY STRICKEN MONDAY EVENING

Mrs. Martin Cavanaugh Dies Suddenly at Home Here

Striking with stunning swiftness, death claimed one of Niles old-time residents Monday evening, when Mrs. Mary Ellen Cavanaugh, 55, wife of Martin Cavanaugh, succumbed to a heart attack.

Mrs. Cavanaugh, who had been troubled with a slight cold, called to her husband shortly after dinner. He entered the house from the garden, to find her crumbled form. Dr. N. Catherine Holden, summoned immediately, pronounced Mrs. Cavanaugh dead. William Cavanaugh, only son of the couple, was summoned from the meeting of the Niles Junior Chamber of Commerce, of which organization he is the treasurer.

A native of Cleremorris, County Mayo, Ireland, Mrs. Cavanaugh lived in Philadelphia for a time after coming to the United States. She was married to Martin Cavanaugh in San Francisco in 1903, and returned with him to Niles, where he was employed at the time. They have made their home here since. In addition to her husband and son, she is survived by a sister, Mrs. Imhof, wife of Major Imhof, of New York, and by a brother and sister in Ireland.

Funeral services will be held from the Cavanaugh home here this morning at 9:00 o'clock, under the direction of the Pratt mortuary. A high mass will follow at the Corpus Christi church, Niles, at 9:30 o'clock, with the Rev. Father Emmet O'Connor officiating. Interment will be in the Holy Cross cemetery, in San Francisco.

Elderly Woman, Lost, Returned to Her Home

An elderly woman, whose name was not learned, was taken into custody by local police last Saturday, when it was noted that she was of unbalanced mind. She had taken a room at the DiGiulio apartments here Friday night, saying that she was seeking friends, "who would turn up."

Mrs. Egizia Di Giulio, apprensive for the woman's safety, after listening to her rambling talk about a "son," and unable to get any definite statements as to the location of her home, called the authorities, who took the woman to Hayward.

It is thought that she is an Oakland woman, known to have left her home several times before.

Public Interest To Be Taken By Graduations

OLD-TIME FILMS TO FEATURE THEATRE FETE TOMORROW

Familiar scenes and faces will flash on the screen of the Niles theater tomorrow night, when old-time pictures, taken in Washington township, will be the main item of an interesting program, for the Niles Junior Chamber of Commerce theater party.

With the first show to start at 6:45 p. m., the Juniors are preparing to handle a capacity crowd. Ticket sales, as tabulated by George Lucas, ticket chairman, point to great interest in the show. The second show will begin at 9:15 p. m.

In addition to the old-time films, there will be a feature picture, "It's a Small World," starring Spencer Tracy, and short subjects, including a cartoon.

Vaudeville, rare here, will be a feature, with both local and professional talent. Among the latter will be "Sims," cartoonist; and professional dancers, and there will be musical numbers by local artists.

During the performance intermissions, and in the lobby both before and after the show, members of the Laura Loma parlor, Native Daughters, will hold a candy sale.

Music during intermissions and with the old silent films, will be by Campos' Sunny Californians.

Eighth Grade Trip to San Francisco Tomorrow

Members of the graduating class of the Niles Grammar school, many of whom have never had a boat or train ride, will be given one of their greatest thrills tomorrow, when the class takes a trip to San Francisco, to visit Fleishhacker zoo and Golden Gate Park. The students will be accompanied by Principal E. Dixon Bristow and Miss Dorothy Van Dervoort.

Next Wednesday night the graduating class will have a private dancing party at the school auditorium. The affair will be exclusively for members of the eighth grade.

PAUL PITMAN SPEAKS BEFORE CHAMBER HERE MONDAY

Stating his pleasure at having lived and taught in Washington township Paul Pitman, Washington Union High school instructor for the past three years, was speaker of the day at the Niles Chamber of Commerce meeting Monday. Pitman who accepted a position in San Francisco, will soon leave this district.

Pitman, in his talk, 'What does the child owe its parents?" brought out the responsibilities of the parents to the child, in that they should command his respect by their own example of proper living. He read "a ten commandments for parents" including a number of vital ideas designed to mold the child into a definite person, and not a mere reflection of the parents.

A. J. Rathbone, in introducing Pitman, lauded his work with the pupils, saying that he was one of the ablest teachers in sounding the student mind.

In the absence of Chamber President E. C. Grau, R. H. Bennett conducted the meeting. The only report made previous to Pitman's talk, was that made by H. L. Scott on the first games in the second half of the South County baseball league.

W. H. FORD SPEAKS AT JUNIOR MEET MONDAY

IDENTITY OF DEAD ITINERANT IS ESTABLISHED

Found in the Niles freight yards recently, the body of a man was identified last week through efforts of the Alameda County Sheriff's office who conducted a nationwide search by wire for information. The dead man's identity was established as that of Curtis Grandstaff, of Orange, New Jersey. Police of the eastern state reported that he had received a six months' sentence in the Essex county jail there in December, 1934.

The corpse, found by section workmen, had been identified by Niles' Nightwatchman Arthur Roderick as that of a man he had ordered out of town during the night, and who had later smashed a window at the Niles Tavern and stolen two bottles of whisky.

Death was caused by pneumonia, it was revealed at an autopsy performed by Deputy Coroner John Lowman.

O. E. Walpert Honored by Young Civic Group for Donation of Ground

A vivid portrayal of the history of Niles and a talk on sound business principles was given to the members of the Niles Junior Chamber of Commerce Monday night by William H. Ford, business figure and prominent resident of this district, at one of the most interesting meetings held by the young civic group to date. Fifty-two members were present.

In the nature of a celebration of the completion of the huge hill sign, the meeting specially honored O. E. Walpert, who donated the land on which the monumental marker is placed. Walpert, who has been made the first honorary life-member, was presented with a small engraved plaque, recording his participation in the organization henceforth.

Following the presentation, and a few words of appreciation by Walpert, Ford was introduced as speaker of the evening. He began his talk with praise for the civic group, as the first of its kind, in energy and unity of purpose. He stated that he regarded the junior chamber as a "college" in which the younger men of the community may learn the fundamentals of public speech and action, and urged their continuance of unified action to attain their goals.

In illustrating the opportunities of old days, as compared with those of today, Ford related numerous interesting incidents in the history of Niles. He told of the old mills, the original railroad, and described the founding of the Niles library association. He related the beginning of the first Niles newspaper, the old Niles Herald, founded by him and edited by George Vivian, now a pub-

Pioneer Takes First Trip Out in 50 Years

Progress and life's rapid tempo have had little effect on Manuel J. Robello, one of Decoto's pioneers, it is said, following the report that he has taken his first trip out of town in fifty years.

Robello, who has been ranching on the old May place since 1885, ventured to a Holy Ghost festival at Mountain View Sunday. He had not been out of Decoto for the half century, acquaintances said.

IRVINGTON WOMAN TAKES POISON; DIES SATURDAY

Mrs. Joaquin Perry, 54, Succumbs Before Aid Can Be Called

Funeral services for Mrs. Virginia Perry, of Irvington, who ended her life by taking strychnine Saturday, were held Tuesday morning under the direction of the Berge Mortuary, Irvington. Interment, in the St. Joseph's cemetery, Mision San Jose, followed services at the St. Joseph's church, in the same city.

Previous to an autopsy Monday, family and friends of Mrs. Perry had been inclined to disbelieve that she had taken her own life, stating that she had appeared to be normal throughout the morning Saturday, and had prepared the noon meal, setting a place for herself at the table with that of her husband, Joaquin Perry, well-known rancher, and her son, John, aged 28. After setting the table she went to the back door of her home on Osgood avenue, and called to her son that "she was going on a long journey." She admonished the young man to take good care of his father, then requested that a priest be called. The son immediately called a physician, then summoned a priest. In the meatnime Perry had tried to administer antidotes, but the woman resisted and died in convulsions, before the physician arrived. Deputy Coroner John Lowman took charge of the body.

Three notes, two in Portuguese, and one in English were left by Mrs. Perry, all stating that she "had died by her own act." The Portuguese notes also gave a brief story of her life. She was a native of the Azore Islands, coming to California 31 years ago. She had lived for the last 30 years in Irvington.

Besides her husband and son, John, she is survived by aonther son, Joaquin, Jr.

Mrs. Emma Mercer, of Peru, Indiana, has returned to her home there after a week's visit with her grandaughter, Mrs. J. C. Shinn, Jr.

FUNERAL RITES HELD FOR WIFE OF DR. DANIEL GROSBY

Back on Solid Ground

The evils of the NRA far and away outweighed a few lofty features incorporated in its regulations. It was conceived in an hour of great economic fear that reached a point of national hysteria.

Apprehensive that wealth would melt away, while about us were worlds of food, warehouses bulging with wearables and machinery, and unlimited natural resources, a free people abjectly allowed its congress to delegate to a president powers neither constitutional nor sagacious. Under mass insanity, brought on by imaginary calamity, the most democratic nation on earth over night became one of the few absolute autocratic states in existence. A president, elected by the people, and circumvented and subscribed by certain constitutional limitations of power, found an inexperienced and pliant Democratic majority quite willing to be stampeded into writing out of our plan of government every article that guaranteed the people independence.

The United States Supreme Court has merely reaffirmed the principles of the Continential Congress, and the great men who wrote that ephocal instrument, the Declaration of Independence. It has simply ruled that the constitution of the United States can not be changed by the congress of the United States nor by the chief executive of this country. A way was provided for the repeal of constitutional amendments and for the creation of new

FLAME OF THE BORDER

By VINGIE E. ROE....

COPYRIGHT DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & Co. Inc. W.N.U. SERVICE

THE STORY

CHAPTER I.—Seeking death by throwing herself from the summit of Lone Mesa, to escape dishonor, at the hands of a drunken desperado, Sonya Savarin allows herself to be rescued by her suddenly sobered and repentant attacker. The girl is a self-appointed physician to the Navajo Indians, living on an Arizona sheep ranch with her brother Serge, his wife, Lila, and their small daughter, Babs. For a year she has been engaged to Rodney Blake, wealthy New Yorker, but her heart is with the friendless Navajos and she evades a wedding.

CHAPTER II.—Sonya pulls Little Moon, wife of Two Fingers, a Navajo, through the crisis of an illness. Two Fingers is deeply grateful.

CHAPTER III.—In the desert village, shopping, Sonya again meets the man whose advances she had repulsed on Lone Mesa. He tells her he bitterly regrets his action and has never had a minute's peace since that day. Sonya is affected, but unforgiving. She hears rumors of a Border bandit "El Capitan Diablo," who crucifies his "double-crossers" and has a dire reputation as a despoiler and murderer, vaguely connecting him with her attacker.

CHAPTER IV.—Sonya pays a visit to Little Moon and finds her well on her way to recovery. On her return she rides to the top of Lone Mesa. There she again comes upon the strange young man, but she no longer fears him. When he reiterates his sorrow over his misconduct she indicates forgiveness and assures him a man can always change for the better.

CHAPTER V.—Befriending the wife of Hosteen Nez, a Navajo, she adds him to her circle of devoted friends. At a neighborhood dance she meets the mysterious stranger of the Mesa and demands that he tell her his name. Finally he confides to her that his right name is Starr Stone, that his mother believes him dead, and that he goes by a different name in this region. He departs with a tall, fierce Mexican, with whom he is mysteriously associated.

"Rod!" she said. "We have forgotten him!"

"No," said the other, "not I. Rod will be one of the things I'll have to face—one of the dangers. I shall write to him tonight and tell him."

"What?" The word was in italics.

"Oh, not about Starr Stone or any of the other tragic things I've told you. Only that I cannot marry him."

"And you'll have him here as quick as the air lines can bring him," said Lila quietly.

"You're right," said Sonya after a moment's thought. "I'll not tell him—yet."

Serge came home from his day's riding dusty and tired, weary for sleep. As he was washing at the bench beyond the door he called in to them.

"Sis," he said, "I think there's going to be work for you ahead. I saw old Hosteen T'so today from up Long Ruins way, and he told me there are two sick Indians over there."

"Did he say just where they were?"

"Yes. In a hogan by Blue Water hole. Said there was a rug for you if you'd come. The medicine man's been making sings for them, but they're no better."

"H'm. Darn these medicine men!" said the girl, her brows drawing together. "They kill more patients than I can ever save. I'll start early in the morning."

"If you take my advice you'd better keep a sharp eye out for that very thing—the medicine man. Don't eat anything around where he is, and watch your trails for traps."

"I will," said Sonya.

True to her plan, the girl was out on the desert next day before the sun was up. The thoughts which had moiled in her mind for hours now beset her again. Where was this man who was her man? Where did he follow that monstrous master and why? What was the power which had turned him from her without a backward look? Was it fear, or some strange loyalty beyond the comprehension of a normal mind? What did it portend? And who was the master? Who but that one from across the Border whom the mad Servant called Beelzebub? The terrible prince of bandits who crucified those who double-crossed him. Sonya shivered in the coming day. What had he said to Starr Stone?

"Hombre, you disobey! Let's go."

Where had they gone? What would he do to him? And why had he disobeyed, in what? With deep intuition she knew the disobedience had to do with her, with his arm about her in the public place.

It was a small thing. Not a double-cross. Yet the very thought of the sinister words chilled her to the bone.

"Come," she told herself, "snap out of it. There is something dark and terrible here, but Starr Stone"—again she thrilled at the mental sound of his name—"will take care of himself. He'll come back to talk again."

At Blue Water she found what she had expected, and a great deal more. Two Navajos, an old man and a young one, lay in the hogan hot with fever. From the shelter of a skeleton brush canopy over an outdoor cooking fire Yellow Buck, the medicine man whom she had seen at Two Fingers', watched her with flaming eyes in his wrinkled face.

Critically the girl studied the two sick men. With stethoscope on the hot brown breasts she knew her course.

The old man was beyond help, his lungs already stiff with congestion, sunk in coma. The young one not so bad.

"Bad business," she told herself. "Spanish flu—summer flu—or I'm very much mistaken. This one," she said to the women, pointing to the old sire, "is about to go on the Long Journey. I come too late. This one we'll try to hold. Get me hot water in the cooking baskets and cold water from the hole. Also a warm stone wrapped in cloth."

In two hours the ancient one was gone on that long journey and she helped the women carry him out and lay him decently under some blankets in the canopy's shade.

All day she worked in almost utter silence. The sick man could still speak, and once he asked after Two Fingers' wife, and again directed the women to cook and feed the Blue South Woman.

Here it was again, her sweet and mysterious name among them.

The day wore on, and night came cool and sweet, and still she stayed by the bed on the sand floor, making her mustard compresses for the laboring chest, using hot water and cold alternately, giving her drops to reduce the ghastly fever, and at two of the night by the watch on her wrist the sick man sighed and went to sleep, his temperature down to a hundred.

"Glory!" said Sonya to herself. "It's a great life if you don't weaken!"

She slept a bit herself, and dawn found things better in the hogan.

Noon found them better still, and late in the afternoon she went away, leaving strict instructions to her patient to stay in bed until she came again. If he got up he would die, she told them all flatly, and that was that.

At home she told Lila and Serge of what she'd found and disinfected herself from head to heel before stretching her tired body for sleep.

"I told you there'd be work for you," Serge told her soberly. "I heard of another case today."

"My heaven!" said the girl, sitting up suddenly on her bed in the room beyond. "Where? Is it going to be epidemic?"

"Up in Bad Canyon."

"That's a long ride. I'll need the car for it. Well, heaven help them. I've got to sleep now, or I'll be no good later."

With the visit to Bad Canyon next morning Sonya Savarin knew she faced the coming of ordeal. Not one but three cases met her there, and she heard of five more in a nameless wash beyond.

The days that followed began to take on the semblance of a nightmare. The sickness which had descended on the Reservation grew and spread like some noxious growth. The girl traveled night and day, bumping on long drives in the ancient car, threading the inaccessible canyons on Darkness, stooping in the dark hogans to alleviate suffering, covering dead faces, trying to reason the living out of their superstitious custom of abandoning their dwellings where death had entered.

Sonya sighed and her heart ached more than usual.

It ached all the time, these days, anyway. She tried to think it was for all the fear and suffering she encountered among her lowly people, but she knew better. The deepest ache of all, the deepest fear, lying far down under all the rest, had to do with the memory of a man's haggard face above her head, the clasp of an arm that shook, and a harsh voice saying, "Hombre, you disobey! Let's go."

Weeks had passed since the dance at the Neidlingers' ranch, and she had had no breath of news about Starr Stone and the sinister figure which he had followed from the floor. The Servant of the Lord, whom she had come to draw toward as one who could tell her things, seemed to have vanished from the country.

She had forgotten Rod entirely. She had even forgotten the menace of his threat to let no people—no land—no man take her from him, ever in this world. Had she stopped to remember, she would have written him dutifully, as a shield between herself and his presence. But she did not remember, and in New York Rodney Blake was sending her a wire that very day. Serge, going into the little town for supplies, brought it out the next afternoon.

"What's wrong?" it read. "Write or shall take plane out by Friday. Rod."

Sonya herself drove in late that evening and sent her answer.

"Nothing but epidemic," she wired. "Forgive me. Sonya."

And as she left the straggly small dot of civilization under the thin sickle of a new moon she came upon a tiny cavalcade plodding in the desert's dust. Three burros, their patient little feet shuffling in the white sand, bore two packs and a rider, the latter a thin old man in rusty black whose silvery hair shone in the dusk with beauty.

Her heart pounding, Sonya drew up beside him.

"Good evening, sir," she said. "How is all with you?"

"Good evening, daughter," he replied. "It is well. And you?"

"We have much sickness among the Indians," she said gravely, "and much work."

"Oh, Starr Stone! You Have Come Back!"

"That's bad. I hope you pray a good deal?"

"Well," said Sonya hesitantly, "yes, sir, I do. I have to—to carry on. One needs strength, you know."

"Just so. Just so. And strength will come to you, never fear. Take that One now, that Blue-eyed One. Three nights ago I saw him by a little stream, and he grasped my arm so hard it hurt. The old, you know, my daughter, are soft in the flesh, without resistance. And he asked of you, the dark-haired doctor woman, and called on God for strength. Just so. 'God,' he said, 'if I was strong enough!' Just so. They all come to the knees of God, daughter, sooner or later."

Sonya swallowed painfully. Her eyes felt blurred again with the excitement suddenly in her.

"Tell me," she said slowly, "tell me again—where was he?"

The Servant waved an airy old hand, fine of line and yellow as parchment.

"By a stream," he said vaguely, "to the south. Three nights ago. Well, I bid you good night, daughter. We must be getting on."

He bowed politely, and the burros pattered away.

Sonya stepped on the starter and bounced ahead.

So. He was in the country again. He would be here, somewhere, sometime. Maybe tomorrow. Maybe next day. The winds that blew softly up from the south fanned her face with a perfumed breath; the little moon was fair as a maiden's brow; there were mystery and ecstasy in every shadow of the sage.

CHAPTER VII

Soul's Covenant.

BUT the morrow came and brought its flying trips to this hogan and that, and nothing happened but death and sorrow, and the sun went down and rose again on Sonya and her feverish work.

It was, at the end of another week, when the tide of life in her seemed at low ebb with all the monstrous labor and the strain of human suffering about, that she came face to face with Starr Stone once again. She had just ridden down the sounding aisle of Tall canyon to come out on the dusky levels, when she saw him. Un d'Oro stood like a statue against the great wall's lip, a dim and shining shape of gold, and the man in his saddle held his hat in his hand and looked at her steadily.

Sonya looked back, and such a light broke on her tired face as should have humbled any man. It humbled this one to the very dust, beholding.

"Starr Stone!" she cried softly in the silence. "Oh, Starr Stone! You have come back!"

"I'd come back from hell's edges," he said soberly, "Miss Savarin. I can't help myself."

"I don't want you to," she said swiftly. "Never. You must come to me—always."

She had stopped a few feet from him, and the man reined close beside her, laying a hand on hers, looking into her face as if he could not look deep enough.

"Of course you know," he said simply, "that I love you."

"Of course," she said.

"That I'm dust under your feet—nothing. Less than that. But I want you to know too that I love you as a better man could never love you. I don't love you—no. I worship you, could kiss th' print of your little foot in th' sand. You're a white angel on th' stairs of heaven, and I'm a devil in th' pit—and hell itself is in those separating miles, for me. I come back to look at you because I can't stay away—and I forfeit my life every time. I want you to know that, as a proof, sort of."

"I don't need proof!" cried the girl wildly, "and I know that too! Have known it ever since the night of the dance when you followed—when you followed—"

"Yes—when I followed—and left you standing there in the open floor like the yellow dog I was—and am!"

"No! Because you had to! Because if you double-cross—"

"Hush! I'm here now. Let's talk for a little while as if we were two ordinary people, with nothing between us to prevent. You're workin' yourself to death," he said, searching her face with anxious eyes.

"It's nothing. My part in life. A good one, a great one."

"Maybe. But you're a woman, and so sweet, so beautiful. I'm afraid for you."

"Don't be. I won't die. Nothing could kill me—now."

"Why now?"

"Because," said the girl gravely, "I've got a fight ahead. A fight to take you from whatever holds you, and I'll do it. We've just begun—you and I, Starr Stone."

Her face was like a flower of the dusk, beautiful and dim, but filled with a stern courage, a white fire of the spirit. His hand on hers closed tightly. Slowly he leaned toward her and Sonya leaned to meet him, his eyes, his breast, his lips. In the darkening night she kissed him and knew she had never kissed a man before. What she had given Rod Blake was pale friendship compared to the tide of life which engulfed her now.

Then she drew back, pushed the hair from her forehead.

"Strange," she said, "what life does to us against our will, in spite of all we've ever known, ever desired, ever planned."

"God, yes!" he echoed, "ever known, ever planned!"

"But we can fight back!" she cried. "We don't need to sink under its blows!"

"To a certain point," he said. "Beyond that—no."

"Yes! As long as there's life! I know what the human soul is made of—its strength, its courage. Men—and women too—have done great things, against all odds, because of it. Strong men, strong women. Everyone falls. Only weaklings stay down. Anyone can get up if he wants to hard enough. If he has a reason. I'm your reason."

The man groaned audibly, an inarticulate word of despair.

"If I had the world," he said thickly, "I'd give it all to be worthy to make you that."

He straightened in his saddle, gathered his reins.

"Come," he said, "I mustn't keep you. Do you mind if I ride with you a bit? It's dark enough—no one will see you riding with a man whose head carries a price."

Once again the cold fear shot through Sonya as she turned and rode out across the desert at his side.

At a lift in the dark sage levels Starr Stone stopped and held out his hand.

"I have a reprieve," he said simply, "for a certain length of time. I'll be in this country for its duration. Do you mind if I keep—coming back—while it lasts?"

"Oh," the girl said with a sudden catch in her voice, "you break my heart! What is all this? What is it?"

"Life's mistake—its sins—and penalties," he answered lowly; "its grasping at straws, its compensations. May I come if I'm careful?"

"Come!" cried Sonya. "Any time, any place!"

And, wheeling Darkness, she rode swiftly away to hide the sobs that shook her.

She came in late at home. Serge and Babs had long been asleep, but Lila waited in the dark patio, rocking slowly in the fringed hammock. They exchanged low spoken words and went together into the silent house.

As Lila struck a light she looked across its flame at Sonya.

"You've seen him," she said.

"Yes. At Tall canyon."

That was all and the two women went their ways on soft feet.

That meeting in the dusk at Tall canyon's lip was the beginning of a strange and pregnant time. Two days later Sonya, wringing hot cloths from a steaming water-basket on a hogan's sandy floor, looked up as a shadow darkened the doorway to the east. Starr Stone stood there leaning his graceful length against the lintel.

"Is there anything needing to be done that a husky man can do?" he asked soberly. "Water to bring, wood to get?"

"Plenty," said the girl quickly. "Both of those. Every one in this family is down except the two littlest children."

Without a word the man turned and disappeared, and presently he was back with two baskets of water. He set them inside the door and went away again, returning later with great quantities of the bleached and straggly dead wood of the juniper scrub which clothed the uplands here. He replenished the outside fire where Sonya had been heating her stones for the water-baskets, set the latter in to heat again, poured fresh water into the basket at her elbow.

"Anything to eat about?" he asked practically.

"Very little. There was mutton two days back, but the man's down and the woman, too, and the last went bad on me. I carry cereals, but I'm nearly out of those."

"O. K.," he said briefly. "I'll fix that."

Sonya went on about her ministrations, and in the course of an hour he was back with the dressed carcass of a freshly slaughtered sheep. Without comment he put small pieces to cook.

"This will do nicely," he said when Sonya came out of the hogan. "I've hung the meat in the tallest scrub I could find back of the corral. Wrapped it in a couple of sacks. It's in good shade and should cool out all right. What next?"

"Nothing," she said. "But this is priceless."

And when, two hours later, Sonya rode out across the hot sage levels, Starr Stone rode beside her on his golden horse.

"There's no one hereabout but Navajos, and they're few and far apart," he said. "I think we won't be seen."

"And what if we are?" the girl asked wearily. "Why should it matter?"

"We won't be. And you may need me where you're going, like you did back there."

"Oh, I will. Conditions are pitiful in nearly all these lonely places. No water—no food—no wood. Everybody too ill to get them."

"And what have you been doing about it?" he asked curiously.

"Getting them myself, wherever I could," she answered, "but it's beyond me now. There's so much to do. So many sick. I've buried three people—myself."

She looked at him with haggard dark eyes in her worn young face, and the man looked quickly away.

"What's the government agency doing?" he asked. "What about the schools? Haven't they got doctors?"

"Of course. But they've got their hands full in their own vicinity. We're so far away here—on the very edge of the Reservation, you know. But I won't give up a single one of them without a fight and the best one I can put up."

When they passed the spot at the canyon's lip where they had met in the dusk, Starr Stone reached over and laid his hand on hers upon the pommel.

"Soul's covenant," he said; "it was that we made here. From everlasting to everlasting. No matter what comes, we'll remember the feel of the little winds, the look of the starlit sky: It will go with me to the end, wrapped in the center of my heart—Sonya."

"Soul's covenant," said the girl tragically, "from everlasting to everlasting. Amen."

And they rode forward into the dark mouth of the shadowed aisle, the good woman and the bad man, to that selfless service of humanity which is the immortal flame in the mortal dross.

CHAPTER VIII

Clouds of Portent.

IN THE hard days that followed, Sonya knew a fire of ecstacy among the dark shadows of disaster. Wherever suffering and death entered the lowly hogans, there the steady hands of Starr Stone were a bulwark and a help. They were gentle as a woman's with a hungry child, holding a cup to the parched lips, bathing hot dark faces with a little rag, and once he brushed and braided the black hair of a dead mahala before they buried her.

And that day Sonya wept against his shoulder for sheer misery at the tragic fate which had made of this man an outcast and a pariah.

So the hectic days passed, with little count of them and these two working together at their humble tasks. Once the girl told him, "You're no lost soul as you'd have me think. You're of that brotherhood of which Christ spoke when he said, 'If ye do it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye do it unto me.' Servers of the world." And he had made no answer.

They kissed each other now at parting, softly, as if the thing they held between them was so precious that a careless touch might destroy it utterly. To the man there was tragedy and stark sorrow in every touch of Sonya's lips, her hands, the tender brushing of her cheeks against him. He was blessed beyond all dreams, humbled beyond all imagining.

And he knew how fleeting this paradise must be, how soon life and its mandates must take him away from her forever. It was this knowledge which made the enchanted days so short, so unreal.

And by the end of that week the strain lessened. Everywhere her people were getting up from their hogan floors, thin brown shapes with big eyes in their dark faces, and no more were lying down. The epidemic was dying out. Those that were left began to be busy making new hogans before the summer should be gone, for they would not live in any house where death had been. They feared the tchindis, or ghosts of the dead, and malevolent spirits. But they looked at Sonya and Starr Stone with long looks, unfathomable looks, and sometimes a woman touched the girl's hand tentatively, or a man said some clipped, guttural word which the latter could not understand and Sonya interpreted.

"Hosteen Little Man says we are the Healing Winds," Or, "Our medicine is better medicine than Yellow Buck's."

And now Life made ready to take its reckoning. She had lived in these rushing weeks, lived very fast, very full, known the dark of sorrow, of pity, and the light of great joy, the pleasure of good work well done. She had bloomed in the glow of such love as she had never dreamed of, what time she could spare to it, and felt as though she were richer, more vital, in all the reaches of her nature. Now, with the cessation of the sickness, she turned her eyes toward the future and what it held.

"Now," she told Starr Stone, "we'll begin to think of us."

But Starr Stone shook his head.

"I," he said, "must think of you. My reprieve is over—was over some days ago. I'll be going back—to where I belong."

But Sonya smiled. It did not occur to her that anything could be so dark and strong that she and her strength could not conquer it.

"We'll not talk of that just now," she said, "let's ride to the top of Lone Mesa. We owe it something—the mesa."

"I owe it something," he said passionately—"owe it my everlasting apologies, my undying reverence. It was there I saw creation as it was meant to be—in your white face on the cliff."

So they swung south from their

LANGDON HOME AT ALVARADO BURNS FRIDAY NIGHT

Startled from the dinner table to discover the entire roof of their home in flames, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Langdon and Mrs. Fred Muller were forced to stand by Friday night while a sweeping fire destroyed the Langdon house, at Alvarado.

The large home, built in the early '70's by Ebenezer Herrick Dyer, builder of the original sugar refining plant at Alvarado, was one of the few remaining examples of a once-popular architectural type. It was situated near the sugar refinery at the end of the Alvarado creek road.

Both the Alvarado and Decoto fire departments answered the alarm, but were unable to quench the flames, which had obtained a start even when discovered. Neighbors assisted the Langdons in saving most of their household goods. The loss was estimated at more than $10,000. The fire is supposed to have started from a defective chimney flue.

Mrs. Fred Muller, wife of Fred Muller, popular local boy, and second baseman for the Oaks, Oakland Coast League ball club, has been making her home with her parents during the baseball season.

"DUMMY GUN" ROUTS WOULD-BE-THIEF LAST WEEK-END

Considering his duty rather than the command to put up his hands, "Bob" Groat, watchman at the Washington Union High school, routed a would-be thief Saturday night, with nothing more than a short piece of pipe.

Groat, who carries neither gun nor club, was returning the section of pipe to the school shop after finding it misplaced at about 3 a. m., when the intruder stepped out of the shadows with a command to "stick 'em up." Groat pointed the pipe at the thug like a gun and ran toward him. Melting back into the dark, the man disappeared. Groat called Nightwatchman Don Bates, who was unable to find trace of the would-be-thief after a careful search.

A. J. Rathbone, school principal, stated that the school watchman's duty is primarily that of guarding against fire.

TOMATO PRORATE PLAN BENEFIT TO GROWERS

Facing control and cooperative groups in all business connected with the sale and handling of their crop, tomato growers throughout the state are rapidly solidifying their ranks through support of the state proration program, designed to give the farmer a voice in distribution and marketing of his, according to statements made by B. H. Shepley, State Farm Bureau representative, in a talk before the Alameda County Farm Bureau recently.

Shepley pointed out that the proration program is progressing satisfactorily in nineteen counties in the area proposed. The plan will cover the present season production and prices. He cited the benefits to be derived from the plan to producers of canning tomatoes, who will be assured of uniform grading and payment for their product. In speaking of payment to growers, Shepley said that the Law and Utilities department of the California Farm Bureau now has claims pending for its members against canners in excess of $450,000, owed principally by some of the smaller canning concerns. Shepley stated that this condition enables the non-paying canners to undersell responsible canners on the market.

Stating that the prorate plan, well-balanced and practical, will provide an orderly marketing program, controlled and administrated by the growers themselves, will result in benefit to both growers and consumers, Shepley urged its support.

TWO SENIOR PLAYS GIVEN LAST WEEK AT W. U. H. S.

Two senior plays, one staged last Wednesday night and the other Friday, were given by members of the 1935 graduating class at the Washington Union High school. Both were well attended.

On Friday night the audience was delighted with an excellent performance of "Cappy Ricks." The movement of the play was fast and clear, with true characterization in the parts. Vernon Ellsworth, as Cappy Ricks, was excellent in his part, as the emperamental and whimsical Cappy. Others in the cast who played their parts well were: Doris Machado, Robert Zeigler, Lillian Freitas, Nicholas Moore, Arthur Ferreira, Jack Rathbone, Leona Solon and Anthony Roderick.

Student director was Patricia Banton. Joseph Amaral handled the lights and properties. Edward Rose was advertising manager.

APPOINTMENT OF NEW TEACHERS AT HIGH SCHOOL MADE

Mr. and Mrs. Paul Pitman, residents of Centerville for three years, during which period Pitman was a valued instructor at the Washington Union High school, will make their home in San Francisco hereafter, following Pitman's appointment as assistant to the president of the new San Francisco Junior college.

Alvin Morse, of Ripon, will replace Pitman at the local school.

Another new instructor at the Centerville school next fall will be Miss Margaret Fisher, University of California graduate, who will take the place vacated by Mrs. Jessie Hawkinson, the former Jessie Godfrey, who was married several months ago.

Appointment of both new teachers was confirmed at a meeting of the board of trustees last week.

At the same meeting the school officials voted to make application to the PWA, for a portion of the estimated cost to make the local school safe from earthquake damage. A survey, made last year by state architects, outlined reinforcements to cost approximately $15,000. The school authorities are requesting that the PWA supply about $7000 of this amount.

AUTOCRACY VS. DEMOCRACY, THE CHANGING WORLD

To use the expression contained in an old song relating to the emotion of love and apply it to modern economic and social conditions, would seem apropos just now. The opening words run "Love comes like a summer sigh, softly o'er you stealing." So it seems in the world at large the principle of autocracy is coming creeping, creeping everywhere. Clever leaders are using craftily the psychology of mass hysteria now so prevalent in all peoples to set themselves up as saviours and deliverers. The demand for change now heard on everyone's lips is a convenient means to secure a hearing.

The power of oratory is just as great as it ever was, intensified, no doubt, by the radio. Much of the power of a popular leader comes from the almost universal idea of our feeling of helplessness, or in other words the inferiority complex. There are other sources of his power, but this is the strongest. He asserts that he has what others lack. Great masses of people are subject to suggestion. This might be called mass hypnotism. And this is closely related to the tendency toward imitation. We can see this in fashions; in the tendency to follow the crowd; the herd instinct.

At the time Hitler rose to power in Germany it was on a platform of National Socialism, in which all kinds of promises were made, but when he gained power there was nothing resembling socialism in his program.

The condition of affairs in Russia is said to be deplorable.

In our country the tendency toward dictatorship is gradually but surely developing. While the farmers of the nation under NRA, now scrapped temporarily by the Supreme Court decision, are made to restrict production in every line, the country is suffering from a scarcity, and every article produced by the farmer and grower is being imported to supply our own lack.

The legislature recently was confronted with a problem of bonding the cities with the federal government taking the bonds for the loan of money to be used in the construction of public plants.

Democracy has its evils, too, among which is the power of the lobby, controlling the rights of the masses. The lobby destroys the freedom of the representative. The legislators themselves in many instances care little or nothing for the good of the country as a whole, only for their own desire to continue to hold their positions. As a result of this lobbying, which grew so rampant during President Wilson's term that he drove them all out of Washington for a time, many evils exist in our laws which favor certain classes, professions, and others, to the great injury of us all.

No doubt many of these evils can be gradually remedied; and our democracy saved from utter annihilation which would come from too sudden and radical demand for a change on the part of the masses.

OLD WARM SPRINGS SCHOOL WILL BE DEMOLISHED

The class of 1935 at the Warm Springs Grammar school, will be the last to climb the stairs and study in the rooms of the forty-six-year-old structure, it was revealed this week, when plans for immediate wrecking of the historic building were made known. The ground is to be cleared for the construction of the new $75,000 school, to be one of two of its kind in the state. The new building will have "activity type classrooms" for better craft work in connection with the regular classes.

This week the school is issuing two annuals. One, edited by Esther Goularte, has been compiled by the upper classes. The other, edited by Alvin Silva, is the work of the primary grades. Two hundred copies of the books have been made by the pupils, according to L. H. Maffey, principal.

Editorial Comment

ones. The law governing that process must be carried out, the court says, and no short cut is legal, no subterfuge tolerated.

Every good feature of the NRA can be legally and constitutionally enacted. But to be a good feature, it must conform to the tenets of democratic government. We can not make one man master, that a temporary efficiency may be inaugurated—a passing good accomplished.

America is back on solid ground again, after groping in the maze of impracticability, and experimenting with the medicine of autocrats.

On August 3, 1933, the Township Register contained this editorial comment in reference to the NRA:

"While the writer is not at all enthusiastic over this latest rehabilitation plan, he will do his part uncomplainingly, hoping that his apprehensions are unfounded. He trusts that even the major principle of physics will be toppled over and a man can, after all, lift himself up by his bootstraps."

These words, written at a time when the average man was apparently bereft of all reason, was interpreted by many self-appointed patriots, as lese-majesty. Time, however, has brought America back to its moorings, and it has been found that the principles of physics, unaltered throughout the centuries, held good in the years 1933 and 1934, and hold good to the present hour.

Hats Off to Niles Junior Chamber

Paraphrasing an old proverb, aptly we may say, that he who flies may read—read the name of Niles in mammoth letters of white on the Walpert hill, north of this fascinating little city that you and we call home.

An idea conceived by the Niles Junior Chamber of Commerce, and carried into successful execution by Guido Tuana and his willing and industrious helpers, the cement sign painted white now gives the aircraft bearings, and advertises that here in Niles progressive people live. It does more than acquaint pilots with location, for automobilists and pedestrians, also, for dozens of miles south and west can read the huge letter on the hill, standing as a sentinel over a beautiful city and as a marker for the entrance to the scenic playground of Niles canyon.

The remarkable thing about this piece of enterprise is the fact that very nearly all of the work was done by young men who are not operating their own business, but in most cases employed by others. That was as fine and unselfish a spirit as one may find no matter how far one travels. A business man has to a great extent a selfish reason to back public improvement, believing, and believing without error, that it will bring back to him many times in dollars his original outlay. But these boys had no gladsome hope of financial reward. Theirs was a labor of love for the old home town.

Our hats are off to Mr. Kearns, and the score of other members of the junior organization who worked so hard and surmounted very serious obstacles that this civic improvement might add to the lustre of Niles and heap new laurels in the lap of Niles' Junior Chamber of Commerce.

Advance in Modern Music Credited to the Greeks

Greece began the formal advance of music, as it did other arts, observes a writer in the Kansas City Times. The tetrachord, a scale of four tones, having one interval a half-tone and the others whole tones, was used. To the time of Terpander, 650 B. C., this existed in many forms, called modes, and further designated by the names of their originators. The lyre, the chief musical instrument, had four strings, and could be tuned to any of the modes to adapt it to the singer's voice, and also was used to give the pitch.

Terpander added a second tetrachord to the scale, making the first note of the second the same as the last note of the first, and formed a seven-note scale. A century later Pythagoras introduced the octave system, which is the foundation of modern music. Athens soon was stirred with emotion over the music of Sophocles "Antigone" and other dramas, the forerunner of the opera.

Life of Louis XVII

Louis XVII was the second son of Louis XVI, but became dauphin when his brother died in 1789. In 1792, with the French Revolution well under way, with his parents he was confined to the Temple, at first with one or the other of his parents, and then by himself. His father was beheaded in 1793, and the royalists proclaimed the child king, under a regency. Numerous plots were formulated for his escape, successful finally, according to legend. What is known of his stay in prison indicates the legend may be true. In July, 1793, he was placed in charge of a cobbler named Simon, and frequently visited by representatives of the Revolution, who persuaded him to give outrageous testimony against Marie Antoinette, that resulted in the death sentence.

Crude Petroleum

Crude petroleum is not a standard product by any means, but varies in appearance and composition, depending upon its source, says a writer in the Chicago Tribune. Most of it can be described, however, as a black oil with a not very pleasant odor. Chemically, it is not the same kind of an oil as those of animal or vegetable origin. The latter are compounds of glycerin and fatty acids, both of which are in turn compounds of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen. Petroleum consists chiefly of a mixture of hydrocarbons (compounds of carbon and hydrogen alone). Animal and vegetable oils are digestible and can be converted into soap by treatment with lye, while mineral oils possess neither of these properties.

MEMORIAL SERVICES HELD AT MASONIC HOME THURSDAY

Other than the tribute by relatives, the floral pieces were uniform, with a large piece donated by Mrs Alice McDowell, guest of Alcatraz lodge, Oakland

On Sunday the home was visited by members of the Mt. Vernon lodge, of San Francisco. On Sunday evening about fifteen members attended services at the First Christian Church, at Hayward. The Rev. Walter Girdner furnished the transportation.

Last Saturday afternoon, a delegation of former Maine residents, were guests at the Oakland State of Maine Society annual picnic. Mrs. Sophie Blinn voiced the appreciation of the guests. Plans for a picnic at the home during August are being laid by the society.

The two lightest woods, native to the United States, are willow and basswood. They rank with the elms and gums in toughness or resistance to splitting. Because they are so light, tough and fairly stiff they are especially suitable for use in boxes and crates.

COUNTY EXHIBIT IS PLANNED FOR SAN DIEGO FAIR

The second largest relief map of California ever constructed will be shown at the California Pacific International Exposition, opening in Balboa Park, San Diego last Wednesday. The huge map—30 by 12 feet—shows all California water resources, and the proposed methods of conservation. Another relief map, prepared by the State Department of Agriculture, will also be shown, depicting the ranches, dairies, farms and orchards of the state.

The California State Building, in which state exhibits are featured, will have, among other attractions, sectional displays by the fifty-eight counties. Washington township will be included in the Alameda county display with an outline of major industries and agricultural pursuits.

The State Indian museum, at Sacramento, will have an exhibit of the finest collection extant of pottery and relics done by California Indians.

Fourteen of Old Class To Graduate at W.U.H.S.

Of the twenty pupils graduated from the Newark Grammar school four years ago, fourteen of them will receive diplomas at the high school this week. Two of the class moved away, and four never entered high school. The lucky fourteen are Marie Alvaraz, Helen Barton, Patsy Barton, Lucy Dewhurst, Jimmie Dias, Lillian Freitas, Frank Gygax, Mary Lewis, Leona May, James Nevis, Frank Phippen, Richard Texera, Oscar Niemeth, and Seraphine Vierra. Helen Martin, David Rice, and Joseph Hernandez will also return to Newark with diplomas, but they have never attended the Newark school. On graduation night Newark will be represented by seventeen of the ninety graduates.

GNAT SCOURGE

One of the most disagreeable epidemics that has hit Newark in years, is the one of gnat bites that has spared neither young nor old. Shrubs are covered with myriads of them, and they bite with a sting that would make a Klamath Falls mosquito ashamed of himself, residents declare.

SEE PARK

The music classes of Miss Mary Shea and Mrs. Harriet Finger, of the Newark school, enjoyed an outing in Golden Gate park Saturday. A. Leal, of Lincoln district, donated his services and his truck for the occasion, and the San Mateo bridge company gave free transportation to the picnickers.

TABLES TURNED IN FIRST GAMES OF SECOND HALF

Turning the tables on their former conquerors, the Niles, Decoto and Irvington nines defeated the Alvarado, Newark and Pleasanton aggregations respectively Sunday, to start the second half of the new South League. Newark, winner of the first half, suffered the worst defeat, 22 to 5, at the hands of a rejuvenated Decoto nine.

The most thrilling contest of the week-end was the Niles-Alvarado fracas, settled in the tenth inning, with Niles winner, 6 to 5. With the tally tied six all at the end of the ninth, Niles crossed the winning run when Fontes, who had singled and stolen second, scored on Rose's infield out. Alvarado, after earning one run in the third inning, gathered four more in the seventh on a series of Niles errors.

Fontes and Tony Duarte were the heavy hitters for Niles, the former pounding out a home run, a double and two singles in five tries. Duarte hit safely twice in four trips. Lebon and Azevedo each garnered two for five, to lead the Alvarado hitters.

Woods and Ray Duarte pitched for Niles. Duarte in the last three frames gave no hits, no runs and no walks. J. Amaral, on the mound for Alvarado, allowed Niles 11 hits.

The Irvington-Pleasanton game, at Pleasanton, gave Irvington its first taste of victory. The score was 14 to 11. Garcia, Silveria, and Dargitz, led the Irvington batters, with Steinmetz, Schultz and Robello not far behind. The latter, a catcher, was recently added to the Irvington lineup, filling a large cavity behind the plate. Governor, Santron and Mengola hit well for Pleasanton.

Newark, with their star pitcher, Wilson, out of the lineup with a sore arm, were at the mercy of Decoto, Vargas' strengthened charges, in a wild hitting game which ended 22 to 5 in favor of Decoto.

Games Sunday: Niles at Newark, Decoto at Irvington, Pleasanton at Alvarado.

Barn Threatened by Grass Blaze Monday

Sounding at about 1:45 p. m., Monday, the Niles fire siren sent firemen to combat the first recorded blaze set from burning grass this year.

The flames threatened the large barn on the E. A. Ellsworth property, near the home of A. J. Rathbone, high school principal. According to L. Avilla, foreman on the ranch, he had been burning grass near the structure early Monday. A spark must have lodged in a small lumber pile against the building, he thought. The blaze was quickly extinguished. Damage was negligible.

MORE ON W. H. FORD

lisher at King City. Details of the founding of the California Nursery Company and other local concerns were told by Ford, who carried through his address the business theme of establishment of name and credit, as illustrated by the founding of these institutions.

Touching on politics, Ford urged that the younger men take an active interest in the work of public servants, and watch that appropriations are proper.

In conclusion, Ford reiterated the value of unity, and cited national examples. He declared that unity of purpose is patriotism. To show his faith in the group, he subscribed to twenty memberships.

Previous to the main address, President Sam Kerns lauded the hill sign committee, particularly Guido Tuana, who directed the work.

Routine business, concerned mostly with preparation for the theater party tomorrow night, was discused before the addresses.
